College is going great so far. I really like it here at ETSU as I am not too far away from home. The classes are starting to pick up pace now, and I will hopefully be able to keep up. With the bookstore running out of my math book, however, I need to catch up with that class. I will have my first astronomy quiz on Tuesday, and I feel confident that I will do very well on it. I have taken many good notes, so I am not fretting. Astronomy lab seems like it is fun, too, but I have only had one lab so far. I dissent the fact that it is a night lab though. English will be a hard class though, especially since I am not fond of the subject to begin with. I am trying to enjoy the class though so that I do not feel as terrible about having to take it. My web page class is very basic as I know somewhat about designing web pages already, but I am learning new things already. Last, but not least, this class is good also. At first I was very skeptical of the class, but now it seems that it is good that I can have a class that can help improve myself rather than memorize the equation for standard deviation. I have taken the Discover Test and not to my surprise, it told me what I really knew. It showed me that I am interested in computers, as well as being good at working with them. Enough with academia, which seems to be going well, unlike my social life. I suppose as a computer geek, I am destined to not have or care about whether or not I have a social life, but sometimes, I cannot help but to want to make a couple of new friends. I have not really made an effort so I have myself to blame. My boyfriend got into Davis, which is really good. As to how a freshman gets into Davis, I will call it luck. Actually, his roommate put in a very good word. I am glad he was able to get in there though. The rooms are nicer than what a dorm is, and his roommate has been a friend of his for a couple of years. His roommate is usually gone, so it gives me time to be with him after a long day at school or in the case of Thursdays, before I have to go to astronomy lab. Though people tell me that college is very open about new ideas, I still feel as if I am being judged by people, but it is probably paranoia. I have enjoyed the class thus far. I hope that I do not miss any days so that I will not have to take the exam, which as long as I am not deathly sick, will not be a problem. I cannot wait when in four years, I can look back and say, "I am glad that is over."
