

Brandon Buchanan
September 19, 2006
Random Letter 2

Personal responsibility is not dead, but not all things can solely be personal responsibility. Responsibility has to be taken by an individual if one wishes to become independent. Each person has to make his or her own decision about choices in life. One has to choose how to react to different situations throughout life. It is one's responsibility to ensure his or her success in life in however way it is defined by him or her. If personal responsibility is not taken by an individual, it may lead to that individual having a bad attitude or viewing the world in a very negative way. In taking on one's own responsibilities for oneself, it improves the interaction between the individual and others. Many people want to blame problems on other people like family, friends, or society. The truth of the matter is that no matter what has happened, even if it was an external factor's fault, the decision could still be made by the individual to overcome the problem.

There are times when personal responsibility does not always apply. In situations where a group is performing work together, the group as a whole should be responsible, but each group individual has the responsibility to be an active participant within the group. If a person was to procrastinate his or her work, which caused the team to get behind its schedule, then that person has not applied his or her responsibility, but, the group should had kept that person in check or had designed measures for when a member was to get behind. In that sense, it would have been a group responsibility in designing the effective measures to take when dealing with a slacker or to discuss with the slacking member the consequences of not participating in a timely manner in an effort to make that person take up his or her personal responsibilities.